

ABSTRACT

In a video display system, a video is divided into scenes at scene cuts and the scenes are divided into subsequences of uniform duration. The sub sequences are combined into composites called super-frames, which are compressed. The compressed super-frames are played back by being decompressed and the video frames are derived from the super-frames to achieve a simulated version of the original video.

DC2-303244